Beaconhouse National University student societies and clubs operate under the leadership of their executive councils, which are responsible for organizing activities, managing events, and addressing member concerns. Combined, these bodies cover the entire spectrum of areas of interest of BNU students. Each society has a designated president who represents the group in official matters and ensures smooth coordination among members. Meetings of the Presidents are scheduled in person with top management, allowing student leaders to discuss key issues, share progress updates, and raise any concerns. These meetings provide a platform for collaboration, decision-making, and strategic planning, ensuring that societies contribute actively to the university's vibrant student life.

In addition, Beaconhouse National University has implemented a novel, basic democracies model to allow its students to raise any concerns through an e-Portal facility. Through the e-portal, students can directly reach - as individuals or groups - the university's Vice Chancellor (President) and every single administrative office.

Managed by the e-Portal Committee, which includes key administrative heads from different departments, this system ensures that all queries are systematically reviewed and addressed within stipulated time frames. The system also allows students to track the status of their requests, providing clarity and accountability in the decision-making process. The e-Portal provides a structured and transparent mechanism for communication. By offering this digital platform, the university reinforces its commitment to engagement and inclusivity, ensuring that all students have a voice and receive the support they need in a timely and effective manner.

The combination of student presidents of clubs and societies and the e-portal provides an effective and inclusive mechanism for student voices to reach the university management on a regular basis.
